REFERENCE(S)	REF: EGMW-12138, 3 August 1962 The following message is from [] It comes as a surprise to me that we are being charged for these surplus library books as well as for their transportation. I had assumed that we were receiving books after they had been declared obsolete. I did not know that this did not occur until ten months to a year after the lists had been issued. In view of this information, and since most of the materials are being used to build up the Institute library's research collection, it would not be disadvantageous to hold up our requests until the books have been declared obsolete. If it would not be too difficult, I would prefer to continue submitting requests as we receive the lists and have you hold them until the proper time. If items appear on the list which are of particular current interest, would it be possible to list them separately and request their purchase without waiting for them to be declared obsolete?
